Read our methodology → Notes: The U.S. Department of Education's Office of Civil Rights occasionally updates the underlying dataset. ProPublica can update the interactive data in response. Disparity scores are not available if there are few students in a specific racial group to make a statistically significant calculation. They are also not available if data on a particular racial group have not been reported. Some schools or districts reported an overcount of students in a disparity category (such as suspensions or AP courses) when compared to the total enrollment of that particular student group. In these cases, we also omit the disparity score. Due to rounding, demographic decompositions in composition charts can add up to more than 100%. The racial categories for which we show data are: Black, Hispanic, White, Asian/Pacific Islands or Native Hawaiian, Two or More Races, and Native Americans or Alaskanatives. In some cases, we abbreviate the last three racial groups for Asians, two races+ and Am natives. Because of a technical issue with the collection of Office for Civil Rights data on sworn police officers in schools, the data for the security team can be a sub-count. As with any self-reported data, there may be errors in the Federal Civil Rights Data Collection. While districts are required to ensure the accuracy of their data, some may still report incorrect numbers. In addition, for some variables, the CRDC rounds the number of students for privacy reasons. In these cases, student groups may represent a small undercount or overcount. Find errors? Do you have any tips? Email . Specific data for high school tests or high school courses (including geometry, biology, calculus, ap enrollment, SAT test fees, etc.) are calculated from total high school enrollment, while data for other classes (such as eighth grade algebra) is calculated from the total enrollment of students.
